

learned in the mysteries of fengshui, spoken of above in its relation to emperation, who is consulted in regard to lucky spots for graves and times for burial, and other receives, large fees; and the other operated by means of a tortoise-shell and some ancient copper cast. On the whole, we suspect that fortune-tellers do better business in China than in most other countries, even where superstition is still rife, for the Chinese are always like to have a lucky day chosen for everything, be it for the opening a shop, marrying a wife, burying a parent, starting on a journey, or any other matter of the least importance. — Sunday Magazine.

While Florida was paymaster of the navy, a butcher one day brought a leg of mutton to the kitchen. The cook took it and clapped it in the pot to boil, and went up stairs for the saucer, but not returning, the butcher soon removed the pot lid, took up the mutton and walked away with it in his tray. Yet, while living in these straits, Sheridan, when invited with his son into the country, usually went in chaises and four—in ones, and his son Tom following in the other. The editor poor, and seemingly after he got to Washington took to it kindly; but he was also just as well satisfied with the poor as with good, and the question of wages he had not depended upon whether, if this regard, some one looked at his salary. His salary in Washington was to have saved up from his practice about $20,000. This was simply earnings, I don't think he ever made a trade for the purpose of gain in his life. While in Washington the same economy followed himself while the White House was always contented and good enough, he saved during his four years term more than half of his salary.—
